Speech title:
"PHILOSOPHICAL PATHOS IN
MARÍA ZAMBRANO AND ARTHUR
SCHOPENHAUER"

Conference summary:

By Professor Encarnación Ruiz Callejón,
(Faculty of Philosophy and Letters, University of Granada- Spain).

This presentation is one of the results of my ongoing research into the work of the Malaga-born philosopher María Zambrano stemming from the research project of which I am a member "Women and dialogues on peace. Origins and transformations in western societies. Contributions from Andalucía". In the project I develop, starting from the Zambranian reflection on the admiration that would give rise to philosophy, what could be a meditation on what she calls "to be at peace with reality". In this current contribution, however, I focus on another issue, albeit a related one. I refer to a positive consequence of her analysis of philosophical wonder: María Zambrano's invitation is to a broader consideration of the philosophical tradition, to elaborate a more plural and inclusive, less forgetful and more trustworthy account of the effective history of philosophy, which has as a guiding thread the status and limits of philosophical reason and its claim as true knowledge about the world and subjectivity. In that broader tradition there would also be a type of philosophy that insists on affirming the world rather than transcending it. In relation to this, in another broader consideration of the philosophical tradition and of amazement, I address the pessimistic philosophy of Schopenhauer, an author with whom María Zambrano shares thematic interests although he is not one of the authors with whom she strictly engages.
